Developed by a group of veteran industry personnel, the Golden Apple title "Did you know...", the smartphone game Elden Ring, revolves around the story of an adventurer who travels from a distant Land of Legend to the Lands Between through the adventure of slaying monsters and fighting monsters to help others. The game features a vast world and an intriguing story, as well as an imaginative and dramatic battle system and fully-customizable weapons and armor, in which the player can freely choose any combination, and special attack classes, such as Princess, Master, and King classes. In addition to the open-ended gameplay, the story features a multilayered narrative, where the many twists in the storyline all fit together. The game also includes the "did you know?" aspect, which reveals the path to the unknown and the power of the Elden Ring. "Did you know?" is based on a series of media by the same title, which is a fantasy serialized novel series published by Shogakukan, and the "Did you know? Quest" feature, which is another feature of the RPG, have been distributed in English, Chinese, and Korean. ■ MOBILE VERSION 1. Antlion's second title, "Fight Your Way to Victory" (闘魂伝; Jubai de Musubi Eki), is a newly announced fantasy action RPG developed by Tradecraft. In this title, the player must go in to the world of Ærli, where a war is raging against the evil Fairy Kingdom. To spread the light and overthrow the Fairy Kingdom, the player must not be injured by the massive creatures called Titans. The battle system uses the standard battle system of Attack, Defense, Recover that is familiar to most action RPGs, but to enhance the player's abilities, there is a special talent tree, which greatly affects the gameplay of attack and defense. In the world of Ærli, using skills you have learned in your past life, the player must go into the fray.

The association between physical activity and cognitive function has been examined in several cross-sectional studies, but whether this association is bidirectional or of the nature of a protective factor needs further investigation. The main aim of this study was to analyze whether physical activity is associated with cognitive function over the life course. A total of 4062 community-dwelling twins (41-86 years of age) from the Swedish Adoption/Twin Study of Aging (SATSA) study were analyzed. Physical activity was assessed at three time points during the life course (i.e., early adulthood, middle age, and older age) and cognitive function was assessed at three time points (i.e., early adulthood, middle age, and older age) by using different cognitive function tests. A total of 3367 (86.9%) of the participants completed a physical activity assessment at each time point. A total of 877 (25.9%) of the participants were physically active at all three time points. Logistic regression analyses were used to determine whether physical activity was associated with cognitive function. At least 75 min of moderate physical activity per week at each of the three different time points was associated with better odds of good cognitive function at older age. In addition, a substantial lifetime activity level (i.e.,  $\geq 150$  min of moderate physical activity per week) was associated with a 63% decreased odds of cognitive impairment at older age. Physical activity at early adulthood was associated with a decreased odds of cognitive impairment at later age, independent of other covariates, such as body mass index and education. The likelihood of having a high level of physical activity during early adulthood seemed to be associated with the likelihood of having a high level of physical activity in middle age and the likelihood of having a high level of physical activity later in life. This is in line with the notion of a life course protective effect of physical activity.
