Periorbital rhinitis and severe laryngeal involvement are specific manifestations of pertussis. We report a female patient with a history of acute tracheal and pharyngeal symptoms, who was found to be infected by Bordetella pertussis. Despite favorable clinical course after therapy, her conjunctival phlyctenular erythema, hyperemia, and lysis persisted. A nonspecific immunosuppressive therapy was started because of the suspicion of an immunologic etiology for her ocular symptoms. The clinical course was uneventful and complete resolution of her ocular manifestations took place after the introduction of broad-spectrum antibiotic therapy. The present invention relates to an oil-contacting structure. More specifically, the invention relates to an oil-contacting structure that allows components of a machine to be slidably and rotationally guided by means of an oil-retaining plate formed on a lubrication bearing. The oil-retaining plate is made from a flat plate. In the art of a machine, an oil-contacting structure which forms sliding surfaces between components of the machine is known as the synthetic-molding technique which, in contrast to the method of riveting the components to each other, has high bonding strength even after a long period of use. A lubrication bearing that has been known in the art is an oil-retaining bearing that, as depicted in FIGS. 8(a) and 8(b), has an oil-retaining plate 101 which is mounted inside a bearing 102, and that guides components of a machine (not shown) by means of bearing surfaces 103 and 104 formed on two surface planes of the oil-retaining plate 101. The oil-retaining plate 101 is made from steel plate having good mechanical properties and a good wear resistance. The bearing surfaces 103 and 104 that guide components of the machine extend through the entire thickness of the oil-retaining plate 101. Since the surface of the oil-retaining plate 101 facing the bearing 102 is a flat surface, the oil- 0cc13bf012
