Various apparatus and systems are used for collecting, processing, and classifying fluids. Examples of such systems include dairy equipment for milking cows, urine-collecting devices for dogs, wastewater-processing systems for treatment facilities, membrane bioreactor systems for water and wastewater treatment facilities, food-processing systems for waste collection and processing, or the like. In such systems, large quantities of wastewater are produced in a continuous process. For example, in a dairy operation, in excess of one million gallons of milk may be produced on a daily basis, with a daily concentration of milk proteins of 1-3%. The milk is then skimmed to remove the solid, oil, and water content, and treated to recover the protein portion into a usable form. The by-products of skimmed milk contain liquid (or water), milk fat, milk proteins, and milk solids, including any milk proteins that may have been isolated. As the skimmed milk proteins are removed from the skimmed milk, at least a portion of these proteins remain in solution with the skimmed milk. The wastewater from these processes is often high in biocontamination (i.e., with microbial or other compounds) and therefore has to be processed into a usable form. The present wastewater treatment systems are labor and energy intensive, bulky, with huge footprint, and require long durations of operation to degrade the contaminants. Thus, there is a need for new systems and methods for wastewater treatment.
