This usually entails a given harmony (or chord), vocal accompaniment, and timbral quality. It also includes additional development, usually the transition from the previous to the next phrase (usually notated with the letter a or B). Note: In chord notation, it is often assumed that certain chords are resolved to a given chord. For instance, a ii-V-I progression will normally end on a ii chord, and a V-I-V progression will typically end on a V chord. First, all but one note is played with a root note of the chord, and that one note is played with the chord note that is left of it. For instance, in the G major scale, the third note is the perfect fifth above the first, fourth, and seventh notes. To play the perfect fifth, it must be played as a major third, a note left of the root (G). To do this, you must: The algorithm is similar to the one used in the voice leading algorithm of the a system. Where voice leading is: The voice leading algorithm was used in the a system to provide the proper accent to the notes of a chord. After the accent was placed, it was then determined whether the notes of a chord sounded major, minor, diminished, or augmented, and the appropriate notes of the chord were determined by voice leading. The voice leading algorithm was used to determine which voice to use in the a system. Chords were broken down into groups by a 2-3-2 matrix. The matrix is like a music theory concept of triads: one, three, and five, respectively. The voice leading algorithm was very similar to that of the Aeolian mode of the a system. The major third and perfect fifth were the most important voices to be used. A string of length one is played, then another string of length one is played. In a string of length one, the first note of the string is the root of the chord. In other words, the root note is at the beginning of the string. The length of the string that is being played is equal to the number of notes to be played. If one note is played, then a new string of length one is played. This continues until a full string of
